

Johnes Disease Management Program

Test-Negative Herds

Johnes disease is a chronic bacterial infection of cattle and other ruminant animals. Clinical disease is characterized by chronic diarrhea, weight loss, and milk production decreases. Substantial economic losses are suffered by farmers with animals showing clinical signs of disease. As such, producers are beginning to recognize the value of testing and herd certification programs. A number of farms in New Hampshire have participated in the state's voluntary Johnes Management Program and have herds which have tested free from the disease. As a resource to people seeking to purchase cattle and as an advertising avenue for those producers with clean herds, this website has been developed to link these two groups. The department will work to assure that the list is kept current such that herds with positive animals are not included, though current herd status should always be verified with the person listed as the herd contact.
